

The Right Reason for Caesar to Confess Christ as Lord:
Oliver O'Donovan and arguments for the Christian State

I am not an advocate of the Christian state in the sense which I believe this idea emerges in O'Donovan's writings. I am, however, happy to be gaining a reputation as an interpreter of O'Donovan - for two reasons: first and foremost, we owe O'Donovan an incalculable debt in making the great writings of Western political theologians accessible to us once again. A long perspective will be of immeasurable benefit to Christian political reflection as we face the challenges of our day. Second, O'Donovan's arguments for the Christian state are both subtle and powerful. O'Donovan is the most learned, persuasive advocate of a Christian state writing in the English language today.

The power of O'Donovan's arguments is not just his own. What gives O'Donovan's arguments their weight is the fact that he writes as an Augustinian theologian, and his writings have rightly been described as a contemporary version of The City of God.¹

O'Donovan claims that his task is making politics intelligible. He is read, however, as offering a defence of Christendom, a vision of politics in which the state is confessionally Christian. Already the use of the word 'state', with its double reference to a society and its government, reveals something central about O'Donovan's thought. O'Donovan insists on the legitimacy of a government which is confessionally Christian, because he says that this is an appropriate response of government in a society which is confessionally Christian.²

O'Donovan gets from Augustine the following propositions which are foundational for his own political theology:

¹ De Kruijf 'The Function of Romans 13 in Christian Ethics' in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood? (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2002) at 232.

² I am aware that O'Donovan is careful in the use of the term 'state' in his own writings and that in The Ways of Judgment at 149 he reminds his readers that it is important to conceive moral society in its own right, before then turning to the political organization which serves the moral society. Nonetheless, it is because, on the question under consideration in this essay, O'Donovan concludes from his social analysis that a particular

- 1) The Church, not the political community, is the true society.³
- 2) Societies are united by their common objects of love, i.e. by the things which they identify as most important.⁴
- 3) Worship, including the ascription of ultimate worth, offered to that which is not God is worship of the demonic.
- 4) There can be no right in a society that does not acknowledge the right of God.⁵
- 5) Government action is only justified when, in the absence of such action, wrong would be done ('the wrong principle').
- 6) Government may legitimately offer deliberate assistance to the Church.

Exegeting O'Donovan as a theologian advocating a Christian state is not straightforward, because O'Donovan claims that he is only in favour of the possibility of a confessionally Christian constitutional order, not its necessity. His ostensible arguments for the possibility of a Christian state are based on the impossibility of the state being neutral as regards the claims of God-in-Christ, the appropriateness of a conscious response by government to the mission of the Church, and the rightness of recognition of the Church by government as an act of representation. Underlying those arguments, however, are deeper commitments by O'Donovan to, firstly, the necessity of the evangelical obedience of rulers being given expression in the form of an act of recognition of the Church; and, secondly, an understanding of the central importance of Christ to right decision-making.

O'Donovan's surface arguments for the possibility of the Christian state will be considered first, before turning to the deeper arguments from judgment which O'Donovan has available to him and which undergird his work.

action of government is possible, that it is appropriate in the present context to speak of his arguments for a Christian state.

³ By this, I am not equating the Church with the civitas Dei, but rather recognising that for Augustine, as for O'Donovan, it is the Church and not the political community which is primary.

⁴ Augustine City of God, book XIX, chapter 24.

⁵ Augustine City of God, book XIX, chapter 21; O'Donovan The Ways of Judgment (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005) 76.

I. O'Donovan's ostensible arguments for the possibility of a Christian state

A. The impossibility of neutrality

For O'Donovan, political authority is adequately constituted when there is in a society a person or an institution which possesses '(1) sufficient might to govern, (2) sufficient identification with the tradition of the community to govern legitimately, and (3) sufficient commitment to righting wrong to govern justly.'⁶

However, in The Desire of the Nations, O'Donovan argues that the Ascension of Christ means that political authority, whilst still needing to rest on the threefold combination of power, tradition and judgment, is now solely justified by its role in delivering judgment. This, he argues, is the unprecedentedly lean doctrine of political authority which Paul offers in Romans 13.

Although they remain indispensable requirements for the exercise of political authority, what has changed in the light of the resurrection-Ascension is that 'The accumulation of power and the maintenance of community identity cease to be self-evident goods; they have to be justified at every point by their contribution to the judicial function. The responsible state is therefore minimally coercive and minimally representative.'⁷ Government is to be coercive and representative only to the extent necessary to give its judgments over the matters in respect of which judgment needs to be given effectiveness and authority.⁸ Because of its threefold basis, however, political authority is subject to the endemic temptation to forget its primary obligation and to concentrate on the exercise of power or its representative role.

⁶ O'Donovan Resurrection and Moral Order: An Outline for Evangelical Ethics (2nd edn.; Leicester: Apollos, 1994) 129; The Ways of Judgment 227.

⁷ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 233. In Ways of Judgment 4 he says: 'the New Testament ... strips down the role of government to the single task of judgment, and forbids ... the consummation of the community's identity in the power of its ruler.'

⁸ O'Donovan is not an advocate of the minimalist or ultra-minimalist state, but he does want to limit the powers of government to those which are necessary for the doing of judgment.

O'Donovan identifies the political rulers of this age among the powers whom Christ has defeated.⁹ According to O'Donovan in The Desire of the Nations, following the Ascension of Christ, henceforth political authorities can either obediently accept their limited role or idolatrously reject it. There is no other choice.¹⁰

As Jonathan Chaplin summarises it, the fundamental shape of O'Donovan's political thought is that 'what God has done in Jesus Christ is focused in the life and mission of the church, which is called to bear witness to the triumph of Christ before the world and its rulers, and to summon them to obedience to him.'¹¹

'The service rendered by the state to the church is to facilitate its mission. The state itself cannot pursue the mission of the church, for it is not consecrated to that task and its weapons of coercion are not fitted for it. But it may facilitate the mission of the church, or impede it. It may facilitate it, first, simply by performing its own business responsibly and with modest pretensions. In the Christian era there is no neutral performance on the part of rulers; either they accommodate to the energy of the divine mission, or they hurl themselves into defiance.'¹²

The neutrality of late-modern liberalism is unmasked by O'Donovan and revealed to be a godless or idolatrous oppression of the Church, a subtle and disguised form of humanity's rebellion against God. Neutral liberalism's rebellion takes the particular form of seeking to reduce the Gospel to a private matter, denying its right or power to effect public transformation.

B. The conscious recognition by government of the mission of the Church

⁹ De Kruijf 'The Function of Romans 13 in Christian Ethics' in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood? (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2002) 225-237 at 226-228.

¹⁰ O'Donovan Peace and Certainty: A Theological Essay on Deterrence (Oxford: Clarendon, 1989) 116-117; The Desire of the Nations 147.

¹¹ Chaplin 'Political Eschatology and Responsible Government: Oliver O'Donovan's "Christian Liberalism"' in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood? 265-308, at 269.

¹² O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations: Rediscovering the Roots of Political Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 217.

The most controversial part of O'Donovan's thesis, is the assertion that beyond the conscientious performance of the state's own tasks, however, 'there may be a conscious facilitation [of the church by the state], based on the recognition of the church and acknowledgment of its mission.'¹³

This co-operation between state and Church is a blessing which may result if the state responds positively to the Church's witness to it. What is fundamentally important, however, is not the state's response but the faithfulness of the Church's witness.

From the book of Daniel, O'Donovan draws the lesson that '[t]he co-operative relation between Israel and the empire is not a right, and to make a priority of preserving it can lead to fatal compromises.'¹⁴ The co-operation is not a stable one because the empire itself is not stable. One of the reasons for their instability is that empires do not understand themselves; they are unaware of their own fragility.¹⁵ The Church must never become so comfortable in its relationship with government that it prioritises its privileges over its primary duty of speaking the word of God into political life. Only by understanding the nuances of O'Donovan's qualifications that the mission of the Church is never complete and that the Church does not have the right to expect co-operation from government can premature triumphalism be avoided.

For O'Donovan, 'the kingdoms of this age are not in the business of saving subjects' souls', that is what they are incompetent to do.¹⁶ They may, however, lend assistance to the church which is in that business. The way the account is put forward is reminiscent of old forms of argument that rulers act as fathers of their nations, who can commit on behalf of their nations to follow God. In O'Donovan's thought, the godly prince is not just a blessing to the nation which he governs, but may be the embodiment of that nation's choice to serve the one true God. For O'Donovan, eschatology is only over-realised when the political authority purports to enforce on all its citizens that commitment to a particular vision of Christianity which it

¹³ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 217.

¹⁴ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 87, 216.

¹⁵ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 88.

¹⁶ O'Donovan 'Behold, the Lamb!' Studies in Christian Ethics 11(2) (1998) 105.

has declared pars pro toto. This leads on to the third aspect of O'Donovan's explicit arguments for the recognition of the Church.

C. Recognition of the Church as an act of representation

As O'Donovan has argued that judgment, not representation, is the bene esse of government (at least in the Post-Ascension Era), it is surprising to find that the surface arguments he offers for the confessional state are arguments from the representative function of government.

Central to O'Donovan's 'defence of Christendom' is the claim that a human society has a need to express its shared moral and religious agency through its government, to have its government reflect its 'deep social agreements'.¹⁷ The political act 'can give moral form to a community by defining its commitment to the good in a representative performance'.¹⁸ Because of this need, to exclude government from 'evangelical obedience' also undermines the capacity of society for such obedience.¹⁹

O'Donovan's argument at The Desire of the Nations 246-50 is summarised by Chaplin as follows:

'... given the need of society for government in order to express its shared moral and religious agency, excluding government from "evangelical obedience" also undermines the capacity of society for such obedience. ... [S]ince only government is able to define the unifying moral vision which every society needs, a vital part of the task of the church now is to proclaim anew the legitimate function of political authority as mediating the authority of God.'²⁰

¹⁷ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 222. O'Donovan's wife, Joan Lockwood O'Donovan complains in 'A Timely Conversation with The Desire of the Nations on Civil Society, Nation and State' in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood? 377-394 at 392 about the use of judicial interpretation of human rights legislation to 'undermine the legitimate representation of the moral and spiritual understandings within society'.

¹⁸ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 249.

¹⁹ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 246-50; Chaplin 'Political Eschatology and Responsible Government' 287.

²⁰ Chaplin 'Political Eschatology and Responsible Government' 287.

O'Donovan's concern is that by asserting that religion is none of the government's business, the church also concedes that government is none of God's business.²¹ He sees the paradigm example of this error as being found in the (non-)establishment clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

O'Donovan's argument seems to run thus. Only when a society conceives itself as under the rule of God can it expect evangelical obedience of its rulers. Therefore if a society denies that its rulers are capable of or required to submit expressly to the rule of God, then it is denying that it is itself capable of or required to submit to the rule of God. Such a claim requires that the response from the ruler which is demanded be a representative response. If the role of the ruler does not require express submission to the rule of God, then an agnostic attitude by the ruler to questions of faith need not compromise the society's own response to God.

O'Donovan has correctly ruled out the possibility of rulers' responding to the Church's mission as an act of their power, but his own theory seems to rule out the appropriateness of their response as a purely representative one. In the era after the Ascension, if the role of government is limited to determining questions of right and wrong, the ruler's response to the Church's mission can only be legitimate if it is required as an act of judgment, for that is the bene esse of politics. The question, therefore, is whether underlying O'Donovan's explicit arguments for recognition of the Church as an act of representation is a deeper argument that recognition of the Church may be required as an act of judgment.

II. O'Donovan's underlying presuppositions which lead to the necessity of a Christian state

A. The political implications of the Gospel in terms of the evangelical obedience of rulers

As I have already shown, although O'Donovan overtly argues that a Christian state is only a legitimate possibility and not in fact a necessity, O'Donovan's underlying presuppositions render a state which refuses to confess Christ in its government a state which participates, at an institutional level, in the rebellion of humanity against the rule of God.

²¹ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 213.

This is revealed in the form of O'Donovan's attack on the (non-)establishment clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. O'Donovan wants to rehabilitate the idea that it is legitimate for political authorities to 'offer deliberate assistance to the church's mission.'²² O'Donovan attacks the (non-)establishment clause as the paradigm denial of the possibility of the Christian state. He writes:

'The evangelical Christians who helped shape the new doctrine ... proposed to instruct princes that they were dispensable to the Holy Spirit's work, and to send them to the spectators' seats. ... [I]t ended up promoting a concept of the state's role from which Christology was excluded, that of a state freed from all responsibility to recognise God's self-disclosure in history.'²³

O'Donovan sees the great danger facing the Church today as being that of allowing the state to define the scope of its own authority, and rubber-stamping that authority. He is more worried about that than about the state becoming the Church's tool for religious coercion. In The Desire of the Nations, he argued that while both religious coercion and civil religion offend against the Gospel and natural justice, 'civil religion wears the form of the Antichrist, drawing the faith and obedience due to the Lord's Anointed away to the political orders which should have only provisional authority under him.'²⁴

Even in his early work On the 39 Articles,²⁵ O'Donovan's preoccupation was to stress what has been lost through the demarcation of the sacred-secular distinction in terms of 'violence to the wide-ranging claims of the apostolic gospel' rather than to criticise the mediaeval and Reformation attempts to police Christian society.²⁶ O'Donovan wants to re-assert 'the claims

²² O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 244.

²³ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 245.

²⁴ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 22.

²⁵ O'Donovan On The Thirty Nine Articles: A Conversation with Tudor Christianity (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1986).

²⁶ O'Donovan 39 Articles 102.

of God's word over all our social life.'²⁷ To fail to proclaim the political implications of God's saving power leaves 'people enslaved where they ought to be set free from sin – their own sin and others'.²⁸

Civil religion is, however, only one face of a more general temptation: 'that of accommodating the demands of the Gospel to the expectations of society.'²⁹ O'Donovan's attack on late-modern liberalism is that it has fallen prey to another aspect of this temptation by reducing the scope of the Gospel message so as to exclude public affairs. O'Donovan defends establishment as a possibility because where it is not recognised as a possibility, there is a tendency both the state and the Church to presume that the Church has nothing to say to the state which the state needs to hear. In O'Donovan's view, although establishment is a possibility, the separation of religion and politics is not, and is an idolatry, rendered all the more dangerous by the fact that its nature as such is concealed.³⁰

In O'Donovan's opinion, such a separation is the nefarious consequence of the (non-) establishment clause of the First Amendment.

'... By denying any church established status in principle, the framers of the First Amendment ... effectively declared that political authorities were incapable of evangelical obedience. And with this the damage was done. ... Excluding government from evangelical obedience has had repercussions for the way society itself is conceived. Since the political formation of society lies in its conscious self-ordering under God's government, a society conceived in abstraction is unformed by moral self-awareness, driven by internal dynamics rather than led by moral purposes. To deny political authority obedience to Christ is implicitly to deny that obedience to society, too.'³¹

²⁷ O'Donovan 39 Articles 102.

²⁸ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 3.

²⁹ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 225.

³⁰ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 49; Hauerwas and Fodor 'Remaining in Babylon: Oliver O'Donovan's Defense of Christendom' Studies in Christian Ethics 11.2 (1998) 30-55 at 36 footnote 3.

³¹ O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 246.

Historically, it is doubtful that the evidence from US history bears out O'Donovan's claim. The existence of the (non-)establishment clause did not prevent Abraham Lincoln from pursuing principled political goals on a declaredly Christian basis, nor did it prevent the disastrous, but religiously inspired, attempt at banning alcohol through Prohibition. Nor even, in the twentieth century, did the First Amendment make inadmissible Martin Luther King's leadership of the Civil Rights Movement seeking the political implementation of what he saw as Gospel values. The current deployment of the (non-) establishment clause to keep religion out of politics is, on one possible reading of US history at least, a disturbing novelty.

How does O'Donovan's attack on the constitutionally entrenched separation of Church and state square with his claim that he is only in favour of 'the theological possibility of the Christian state, but not its necessity'?³² I think that they are only partially compatible. What I understand O'Donovan to mean by saying that he is only in favour of the theological possibility of the Christian state is that he does not think that Christians, when they are a minority in a country, should seize power and impose a Christendom solution on the majority population. Instead, he is arguing that, when political conditions are right, and when the public recognition of the Gospel is truly representative of a society's response to God, a Christian ruler may rightfully expressly recognise the Church.

The difficulty in regarding O'Donovan as arguing only for the possibility of the Christian state, is that the assumptions underlying his arguments seem to render the non-Christian state an error, or worse. It is O'Donovan's arguments against non-establishment, rather than his own arguments in favour of the possibility of a recognition of the Church by government, which justify the designation of O'Donovan as a proponent of the Christian state. O'Donovan is a proponent of the Christian state because he declares the non-confessional state to be guilty of committing a cardinal error, of participating in humanity's rebellion against the authority of the ascended Christ, if not of succumbing to idolatry.

³² O'Donovan 'Responses to Participants' in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood? (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2002) 239.

B. The necessity of recognition of Christ as the foundation for right moral decision-making

O'Donovan has not just given us a powerful political theology, he has also offered an important moral theology. The interaction between his political theology and his moral theology is not straightforward. Jonathan Chaplin in particular has pointed out that the political theology of The Desire of the Nations does not fit exactly into the space made for it in Resurrection and Moral Order.³³

O'Donovan argues in Resurrection and Moral Order for what has rightly been called 'the most theological view possible of the doctrine of natural law.'³⁴ In that book O'Donovan argues that there is an objective moral order in creation, but that we only apprehend that moral order rightly when we understand it in the light of the work and person of the crucified and ascended Christ.

At the outset of this essay I identified the proposition that there can be no right in a society that does not recognise the right of God as foundational for O'Donovan's thinking. The importance of this proposition is that in O'Donovan's general moral theory, right judgments cannot be made unless they are made in the light of the work of Christ.

O'Donovan's moral theology is set out in Resurrection and Moral Order. In that work, O'Donovan argues that the moral order inherent in creation is only properly apprehended in the light of the resurrection-ascension of Christ.

O'Donovan makes the same point in his political theology. Recognition of Christ is, for O'Donovan, essential to discerning the divine law, natural and revealed, which is the backdrop to human law-making. His central message is that the Church must constantly have a message to government about its God-given responsibilities. The Church must constantly be telling government what is required in order to do right judgment. Only when government listens to the Church's witness to Christ will government discharge its own distinct moral responsibilities rightly, recognising the created moral order in its true form.

³³ Chaplin 'Political Eschatology and Responsible Government' at 300, and O'Donovan's 'Response' at 309, both in Bartholomew et al. (eds.) A Royal Priesthood?.

It seems to follow that because, in O'Donovan's view, it is fundamental to true moral understanding to see creation as made, ordered and sustained by the triune God who has revealed Himself fully in the resurrection-ascension of Christ, a political authority can only understand what it is to do judgment rightly if it understands creation in that light.

If a ruler cannot do right unless the right of God is acknowledged and if right judgments cannot be made unless they are made in the light of Christ and His resurrection then it follows that government will not govern rightly unless Christ is confessed.

Hence the question which O'Donovan poses: must government confess Christ expressly and constitutionally in order to make the right judgments which the political community requires? If the answer to that question is to be no, it must be because of O'Donovan's fifth principle: it must be because no wrong would be done if government does not confess Christ expressly and constitutionally.

However, O'Donovan's argument is not just that government is mistaken if it does not make its judgments expressly in the light of Christ, it is also that such a government succumbs to, or worse still, leads its people into, idolatry.

In The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine, O'Donovan writes: 'The city of this world loves itself so much that it despises God by comparison, the eternal city loves God so much that it despises itself by comparison. ... the critical idea is that the love has lost its proper grasp on the order of things: it has put second things first and first things second. The

³⁴ O'Donovan 'Response' 63.

obedient believer, by contrast, has a love that is perfectly ordered to the proportions of reality.³⁵

As O'Donovan understands Augustine, Augustine does not deny the existence or reality of worldly goods, but he does deny that these are worth anything in comparison with the eternal good of enjoying God.³⁶ Worldly goods must not be loved excessively. The love of them must be ordered and subordinated to the finis bonorum of loving God.³⁷ Therefore, if you love God rightly, you love everything else in its proper place. And O'Donovan argues that in the light of the resurrection, it is given to Christians to discern the proper place for everything else. However, if you do not love God, then your love of other things is disordered. Radix malorum est cupiditas. The root of all evil is avarice.³⁸ The covetousness of improperly directed love gives rise to the idolatry which is part and parcel of disordered politics.

There is a constant sub-theme in O'Donovan's writings that liberalism exaggerates the differences in desires in society. He argues that what binds societies together is their Common Objects of Love. This description is taken straight from Augustine's City of God Book XIX.³⁹

Augustine defined a "people" as 'a gathered multitude of rational beings united by agreeing to share the things they love.'⁴⁰ Commenting on this definition, O'Donovan writes: 'Augustine's purpose, it is often said, though not uncontroversially, was to challenge an idealist understanding of organized social life with a realist one. To expect "law" of a political entity was to expect too much, Augustine thought. If one only understood what a high and comprehensive good law really was, the most that one could reasonably expect of sinful and prideful communities was some consensus on goals worth pursuing.'⁴¹ For ³⁵ O'Donovan The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine (New York: Yale University Press, 1980) 64.

³⁶ O'Donovan Problem 25; Augustine De Trinitate Book VIII, 4.

³⁷ O'Donovan Problem 29, 31; Augustine The Trinity trans. Hill 96.

³⁸ Augustine De Trinitate VIII, 5; O'Donovan Problem 95.

³⁹ O'Donovan and Lockwood O'Donovan Bonds of Imperfection: Christian Politics, Past and Present (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 54.

⁴⁰ Augustine City of God XIX.24; O'Donovan Common Objects of Love: Moral Reflection and the Shaping of Community (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 20.

⁴¹ O'Donovan Common Objects of Love 21.

Augustine, human societies are held together by what they have in common, by their common objects of love. Unless their common object of love is Christ, a society is idolatrous and damned. Without that common object of love, iustitia is impossible.

For Augustine, the only justice, the only rightness that matters is rightness with God. It is not surprising, therefore, that in this context he concludes that unless founded on this rightness, earthly justice is of no eternal value. However, the godly prince is called to exhibit justice as one of his primary virtues.

The combination of O'Donovan's claims that (1) only Christians love worldly things in a rightly ordered fashion and (2) the true nature of the objective moral order can only be discerned in the light of the resurrection-ascension, gives the Church epistemological authority to speak to secular authorities. Underlying the defence of a confessionally Christian government expressly offered in The Desire of the Nations is this Augustinian claim. O'Donovan has already expounded this claim in terms of moral theology in Resurrection and Moral Order. The natural order which God has created can only be rightly and truly apprehended in the light of the salvation which God has given in Christ. Only a ruler who recognises this can truly govern rightly and wisely.

III. The power of O'Donovan's vision of the Christian state and a response to it

A. The power of O'Donovan's vision of the Christian state

O'Donovan's political theology, whilst and perhaps because it is deeply rooted in the Western tradition of Christian political thought, is a political theology for our time. He offers his vision of a liberal Christendom as an alternative to the neutral secular liberalism which is felt to be robbing the West of its moral resources and of its spiritual commitments without merely mirroring the fusion of religion and government which Islamists seem to demand.

For O'Donovan, Christian thought leads to a law-governed society, which is sustained and informed by 'the missionary presence of the church within its midst' and 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.⁴² The sympathetic ruler does not aim to implement the Kingdom of God by force or to make their whole populace good Christians, but instead to maintain a relatively peaceful and just social space within which the church's mission can flourish. They acknowledge that their rule is subject to the rule of law, which it is their responsibility to promote and uphold.⁴³

Echoing T.S. Eliot, who famously said that humankind cannot bear very much reality,⁴⁴ O'Donovan teaches us that human beings cannot bear too much justice. The witness of the godly ruler to God's justice must therefore always be indirect and partial. In Resurrection and Moral Order at 130 he writes:

'Yet, even at its best, public right action can bear only an indirect relation to the demands of truth and goodness considered absolutely. Justice in human communities is only relatively just. It is not mistaken to think of political authority, by positive law or by other means, as "applying" the principles of natural law to social life; for "applying" is a sufficiently broad term to cover any kind of conscientious attempt to make action correspond to the demands of right. But this "application" is something rather different from what is involved in individual moral decision.'⁴⁵

Political authority is a witness to the truth but compromised by the circumstances of governing fallen humankind. For O'Donovan, a political order 'bears witness to God's justice' when it enacts and enforces law which promote behaviour in line with the objective reality of the creation order, in so far as is tolerable in a given society.

⁴² O'Donovan The Desire of the Nations 249.

⁴³ O'Donovan and Lockwood O'Donovan Bonds of Imperfection 217.

⁴⁴ Eliot Four Quartets 'Burnt Norton' (1936) Pt. 1.

⁴⁵ O'Donovan Resurrection and Moral Order 130.

O'Donovan displays a more moderate reticence about iustitia than he finds in the writings of Augustine.⁴⁶ Nonetheless, judgment is a performance not a normative state. It seems as if the closest a Christian ruler can approximate to justice is in expressing "merciful judgment" to the extent that the society he governs will tolerate.

For O'Donovan, the moral order in creation is not self-interpreting. Moreover, different human societies display different characteristics. Human laws therefore are the product not merely of reflection on the created moral order but also on the particular characteristics of the society which they are to regulate. 'The law (even assuming that in every case it is wise and good law) will differ in accordance with differing social needs.'⁴⁷

Whilst the governmental act of judgment may be described as the application of 'divine law (natural and revealed) to the "infinite possibilities of human wrongdoing"',⁴⁸ this has to be qualified by stressing that judgment 'is always relative to what is reasonably possible within that society.'⁴⁹ 'The truth of a law must also be a truth about the society in which the law will function.'⁵⁰ Framing wise laws is therefore an art, an exercise of practical wisdom. Such a task ought, however, to be informed by the Church's understanding of the given moral order, for it is in Christ alone that this moral order can be rightly perceived.

B. Responding to O'Donovan's vision of the Christian state

I have argued in this paper so far that O'Donovan calls upon us to recognise the impossibility of the religiously neutral state and to acknowledge that just as religiously inspired values permeate a culture, so too they affect the practice of ruling. I have set out how O'Donovan contends that a culture may legitimately express its acceptance of the gospel through its constitutional and legal arrangements. To meet those arguments which O'Donovan explicitly

⁴⁶ O'Donovan Bonds of Imperfection 60-61, compared with 'Romulus's City: The republic without justice in Augustine's political thought' which was the paper O'Donovan delivered at the Society for the Study of Theology Conference 2008.

⁴⁷ O'Donovan 39 Articles 63.

⁴⁸ O'Donovan Bonds of Imperfection 14; Resurrection and Moral Order 130.

⁴⁹ O'Donovan The Just War Revisited (Cambridge: CUP, 2003) 99.

⁵⁰ O'Donovan The Ways of Judgment 19.

deploys, one could challenge his assumptions about the necessarily representative status of any act of faith-commitment by a ruler. Such a response is also effective to counter O'Donovan's argument that the constitutional separation of Church and state is a concealed idolatry, a rebellious denial of God's providence. In response it can be argued that government has neither the right or the duty of declaring, on behalf of a religiously diverse society, a confessional commitment. The ruler may commit himself to following Christ, but his nation's commitment to following Christ must be embodied in the Church not in the ruler's decision. Even if Christians were in a majority and even if they had a substantial agreement amongst themselves regarding ecclesiology and the political implications of the gospel, it would still not be government's responsibility to make a political declaration of Christ's sovereignty on behalf of the nation.

More difficult, however, to rebut are O'Donovan's claims regarding the nature of moral decision-making. The implicit accusation in O'Donovan's underlying argument regarding the nature of political choices is that arguments for a free church and a neutral state proceed on the basis of a denial of original sin and of a downplaying of the centrality of Christ to the moral order. Four possible suggestions might be explored in response to O'Donovan's position, perhaps in combination.

The first response would be to prioritise procedural over substantive justice. Prabhu Guptara has suggested that democracy can be understood as a political expression of love for one's enemies, respecting their point of view enough to allow it to triumph peacefully when it commands a majority. If principled pluralism can be theologically grounded, then we might argue that in this imperfect world right procedures matter more politically than right answers.

The second response would be to question whether the quest for absolutely right answers is not a misunderstanding of the political task. If the ruler's role is to search for a workable compromise, then on that basis precisely because of the limited nature of the tasks government is called to perform, perhaps government can survive on a more limited morality than a fully explicit Christologically grounded vision.

Thirdly, one could argue, on pragmatic grounds, that because of the problems of hubris inextricably associated with confessionally Christian constitutional orders, such an arrangement is best avoided on the basis that corruptio optima pessimi.

Finally, one might ask whether O'Donovan's focus on the right is in fact asking the correct question. The twin commandments Jesus gave His followers were to love the Lord your God with all your heart, soul, mind and strength and to love your neighbour as yourself. Is it more loving for Christians who are in a dominant position in a society to express that dominance through a formal declaration of adherence pars pro toto to Christ in the constitutional order, or is it not more loving for Christians to forbear from doing so, despite wishing to suffuse the public realm thoroughly with Christian values and principles, on the basis that the declaration of such and such a government as Christian is not only presumptive but may actually hinder people in coming freely and truly to Christ for themselves?